It sounds like your life wasn't perfect and people had always wanted to do you harm, but when you were in that situation, did any of that give you pause and why did you decide to transition to living as yourself? For me, I think, no. I think being able to deal with that kind of trauma, which I don't think anyone ever talks about anymore, is one of the reasons @ 1080p.. This is a bit more complicated because a person needs to know where they are coming from first. I know a trans person who had a very strong case; she was very educated about all types of discrimination and violence, and her story was that if she was able to continue on her path, it would benefit her in many ways. As I understand it, she had transitioned from a female to male in her 20s and 30s, and she was married to this man at the time of his transition. She lived a very sheltered life. She worked as a domestic assistant, a nurse, a house painter, got a masters in nursing and had lived in some pretty poor parts of Los Angeles during her college years. She also got a degree as well as been on a number of professional networks and a medical card. Her entire existence was a happy one (even if she felt she had not lived the good life of a "happiest person on earth"), and at the same time she did a number of dangerous, abusive things that her trans partner had a lot of difficulty letting go of..
